When you take a walk through the volcanic highlands, you will get to take in raw scenery that you will probably not see anywhere else. Ranging from streaming hot springs, obsidian lava fields, raging waterfalls, gurgling pools, snow peaked mountain ridges and massive valleys that do not feature any tree at sight and moss covered foothills, these are just some of the things you will see along the way.

Inca Trail, Peru

Although it is quite challenging to complete, this is one of the trails that offers an incredible payoff once you are done. The altitude alone normally makes it quite difficult. Keep in mind that this is not for the unfit as it is among the highest peaks that are found in Peru. Here you get the satisfaction of walking through the Sun Gate to arrive at the Lost City.

White Mountain Traverse, New Hampshire

Hiking these mountains gives walkers an exceptional experience as they offer some of the best wilderness views that you can ever find in North America. It is probably the most scenic section of the Appalachian Trail that measures 2,100 miles. This takes around 6 days to complete. It is an excellent way to enjoy the authentic European alpine culture as it offers an experience that is next to none.

West Highland Way, Scotland

Covering about 96 miles, the Scotland's west highway way is actually long enough to cover a great terrain featuring mountains, moors, thick woods, rolling hills and lonely lochs. These are however

Pennine Way, England

This is a 286 mile trail that is usually referred to as the most physically challenging trek that is found in the United Kingdom. It follows England's mountainous backbone over glacial valleys and limestone cliffs, through the moors of Bronte Country, past the Hadrian's Wall and across one of the wildest stretches in the land before it finally concludes at the Scottish border. This takes approximately 18 days to finish but most hikers normally prefer to break it into small manageable sections. Most people prefer to explore the middle section of the trail and forgo the northern and southern extremities all together.

Great Wall of China, China

This is one of the greatest wonders providing an excellent trail for people who would like to explore it on foot. No one ever hikes this wall by accident as it offers a worthwhile experience that you will probably not find anywhere else.
